Russian software security giant Kaspersky Lab has formed a strategic partnership with a Chinese state-owned company as Beijing and Moscow work more closely in policing their cyberspace.

The deal was signed on Wednesday at one of the panel meetings of China's second World Internet Conference in Wuzhen, Zhejiang province.

Hours before the meeting, President Xi Jinping gave a keynote speech stressing the need for a new set of global rules on the use of the internet and the importance of respecting cyber-sovereignty. Russian Prime Minister Dmitry Medvedev, who also attended the event, supported Xi.

At the internet security panel meeting in the afternoon, Eugene Kaspersky – founder of the Russian software security giant that bears his name – signed a deal with the China Cyber Security Company. The two sides did not elaborate on the extent of their cooperation.

Russia are both accused by Western governments of sponsoring hacker attacks and organised cyberespionage. But experts from the two countries on Wednesday said they were in fact the biggest victims of cybercrimes.

They were also concerned that rapid advances in technology would make it increasingly difficult for states to control the flow of information, posing challenges to order and stability.

"Now all forms of crime can spread much faster and wider because of the internet. No country is totally safe," said Liu Xinyun, chief of the Public Security Ministry's cybersecurity department.

"The number of internet users in the developing world now accounts for more than half of the internet population. Four out of the top 10 internet firms are Chinese. Yet the basic rules and protocols of the internet are set and controlled by the US. We need new rules and new thinking to reflect the changing reality," said a Chinese cybersecurity expert who declined to be named.

Zhao Wei, another cybersecurity expert and CEO of Beijing Knownsec Information Technology, said China faced cyberattacks "every day".

"The attacks are so sophisticated. We are totally defenceless. I call it the 'god mode' attack," said Zhao, without explaining who was behind the attacks. After the meeting, he said the attacker was a "state actor".

Zhao said China needed to speed up research and play a part in establishing standards for the next generation of the internet.

In practice, the opposite of "ending US domination of internet" really means "bring on political censorship." China has a head start in this, because it's net was designed from the start to include the "Great Firewall of China."

the US dominates the internet in the same way it dominates the entertainment industry..... people like what they produce and of course they are aided by using the global language, English. But good luck to Russia & China, competition would be welcome & good for everybody

There are nasty rumours on the internet that antivirus software of various providers excludes detection for state-sponsored spyware. But may be that is only conspiracy theory.
